

The 1854 Cabin Structure

The 1854 Didier Log Cabin was built with whole logs running the length of the cabin, seven logs high with dovetailed corners. These logs are 8" to 15" in diameter, each chinked. The woods used in the reconstruction of the cabin were oak, walnut, pine, cottonwood, and cedar.

The fireplace is erected with stone. The foundation is constructed with large limestones. The loft is 7' x 15'. The main room, 15' x 15' was used as a bedroom, sitting room and dining area. The porch, 7' x 15', was probably used as a summer kitchen. This is where meals were prepared and wash water heated in the winter. In the summer these tasks were done outside to keep the house cooler.

The Move & Reconstruction of the Didier Cabin

In 2008, a corner of the cabin was brought to Brownville, and B.H.S. purchased the cabin from the Last Family. They decided to move the remaining logs located 10½ miles south of Brownville to Boettner Park at 2nd & Main Streets. 2011 was the 50th anniversary of the gift of the park to B.H.S. by George Boettner of Rock Port, Missouri.

The Society began to raise money for the reconstruction project in 2009 reaching out to B.H.S. members, Brownville School Alumni, various corporations and foundations, and friends. During 2011-12, Jim Doty of Doty Construction of Brownville rebuilt the cabin.

The Didier Family History

John B. Didier, II

John B. Didier, II was born in France on Christmas Day, 1827. He arrived in America twenty years later, settling in Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1849 he moved to St. Louis, Missouri, working for Pierre Chateau, Jr.. Mr. Chateau sent him to oversee a fur trading post five miles below Fort Laramie, Wyoming.

On August 19, 1854, the Grattan Massacre occurred at Sarpy's Point about eight miles below the fort. Lt. John L. Grattan was detailed from the fort to arrest a Native American who had reportedly stolen a cow from a Mormon immigrant. Since the Native did not surrender, the soldiers were ordered to fire upon the his tribe indiscriminately, thereupon they were attacked by a large number of warriors. All of the command, comprising of Lt. Grattan and twenty-nine men, were killed.

In latter years, their remains were removed to the National Cemetery at Ft. McPherson in Central Nebraska. Mr. Didier withstood the danger, and following the battle reported the loss to Mr. Chateau.

Two years later, John left St. Louis by steamboat. He came here from St. Joseph and erected the 1854 cabin, living there for 63 years. He took up a homestead of 120 acres and built the cabin, clearing the land, and enduring the hardships of frontier life.

In 1855, he was married by Judge Whitney to Mary Peneaux Beauvais Red Nose Didier Desersa in Brownville. The obituary of John B. Didier II, lists Henry, John III, Paul, Mary Peneaux Beauvais Red Peter, Mary Dero-Nose Didier Desersa in, Cecilia Longcor, Adelia, Gertrude and Myrtle Last as their children.

Prior to her marriage to John, Mary was married to Beauvais, and they had four children. She also was married to Howard Red Iron, and to this union three children were born. In the Lakota tradition one's mother's sisters are your mothers.

It is possible that some of the children were not Mary's birth children, but the children of a sister.

Mary was enrolled in the Rosebud Sioux Tribe, and was a part of the Sioux Nation forced to walk to Oklahoma on the Trail of Tears. She was 66-years-old when she died, and is buried at St. Francis Indian School in South Dakota. Newspapers indicate her death being in 1908. However, her grave marker at St. Francis, South Dakota has 1901 as the date she died. Mr. Didier died September 27, 1918, and is buried at Barada, Nebraska.
